

Reading Machines

A spoken document is a sequence of sentences. The reader should know which one it is on. Highlighting the current sentence keeps the eye and the ear together. Without it, listeners lose their place within seconds.

Dr. Ada Lovelace wrote about this in 1843, roughly. It still holds.

Sentences may wrap across several lines of a page, which means a single highlight can need more than one rectangle. Short ones do not.

Is that clear? Yes! Good.
